HOW

FALCONS ARE EDUCATED BY SPORTSMEN IN ENGLAND.
In Shakespeare's England, when the sport of falconry was at the height of its popularity, the training process was intricate and involved. The first step in the bird's education was the fastening of short straps of leather—jesses—to her legs. These straps remained always on the bird and were used to secure her to the leash. The second process was called seeling the hawk. A needle with fine thread was passed through the lower lid of one eye.
Also there was hooding; a cap was drawn over the bird's head to insure darkness. The hood was generally worn when the bird was at rest. The third step was manning the hawk. She was held upon the wrist while her feathers were stroked, until she became accustomed to being close to human beings. Good meat helped in this. The fourth process was training in the actual hunt. Today seeling and hooding are omitted in this country.
Falconry was practiced as long ago as the time of the Babylonians, but only recently has it been taken up in the United States.
Sparrow hawks are fed on beef and sometimes birds; not chickens or song birds.

How to Waterproof Shoes
Used for Winter Hiking

When you go on a long hike you can't wear rubbers. So if you must walk in wet places the best thing to do is to waterproof your shoes. Buy a cake of cocoa butter at the drug store and get a piece of beeswax.
Cut up the cocoa butter and also the beeswax to about one-sixth the amount of cocoa butter. Melt the butter first, then the beeswax, and put the two together. When it gets cold the butter is something like paraffin wax, but not hard enough yet to make the stitching of the shoes waterproof. Here's where you use the beeswax. You warm the shoe (not heat it), which opens the pores of the leather. Then you apply your mixture by rubbing it on while the shoe is warm, and continue warming the shoe and rubbing till the shoe is thoroughly soaked with the waterproofing mixture.
