and ever kind friend lifeless. His mother was sain moned from the house near by, but fainted upon being confronted with a scene so shocking, "Medical assistance was hurriedly secured, but to no purpose, for the vital spark had forever fied."

By this terrible affliction, a widowed mother is deprived of a most affectionate and duitful son; the community of a citizen of unblemshed reputation; the calling which he adorned one of its most intelligent and progressive members; and the church of his early training and unfaltering devotion; one of his expressive comment.

Charles Noble was a man of whom no other man hood he exhibited only the finest traits that can illuminate humanity. He could no more be guilty of a meanness or a dishonorable act, than a star could be false to its brilliancy. He was absointely, true to all the instincts of gentle and gentemanly nature; he believed in, and practiced, the good in its broadest, highest application. He was a Christian business man, who daily illustrated the entire compatibility of business success with adherence to religious principles. Kindness of heart and a delicate sense of justice were prominent in his intercours with those about him. One of his employes recently said, when his workmen continued their labors after time, he would say, "Come boys, its time to stop work," thus showing an unwilling-ness to avail himself of any advantage, no matter how cheerfully offered. It was his custom to carefully give compensation for any extra labor rendered, and in all t ed the services.

"The sweet remembrance of the just."
Shall flourish when he sleeps in dust."
